3 THE OUTDOOR GURU JANICE FELDMAN

One to watch:

George M. Beylerian, the well-known design impresario, just launched his De Gustibus line in Milan this year. It is an assembled collection of objects created by some of the best Italian design talents of the past 50 years. The personalities and styles of the artists, designers and architects commissioned for this project are easily reflected in the exclusive pieces.

Shop 'til you drop:

West Hollywood has a vibrant collection of showrooms and design boutiques, which always show the latest fashion and home concepts, but I love browsing the retail shops in the Upper Village of Montecito and Coast Village Road.

Can't get enough:

Loro Piana makes beautiful clothing with exceptional quality and discerning detail, and I adore their Panama hats. I also love the designs of the great Milan-based designer and architect Piero Lissoni.

Great way to beat the summer heat:

It's so easy to spend an afternoon at the historic Lotusland estate in Montecito; I particularly enjoy sketching the incredible gardens during my visits.

On your radar:

I am looking forward to the opening of the South Beach hotel in Singapore. It is a part of an amazing residential, hospitality, commercial complex designed by Philippe Starck, and we are proud to be outfitting some of the hotel's spaces.

For the design-obsessed:

The Wallis Annenberg Center for the Performing Arts is a stunning juxtaposition of historic 1930s architecture—it was originally the Beverly Hills post office—and the design language of today.

Coming up:

This year, we are launching several new collections, including The Masters Aluminum Series in collaboration with interior designer Orlando Diaz-Azcuy. I've long admired his talent, and I am so honored to be working with him.

Janice Feldman is the president and CEO of outdoor furnishings mega-brand Janus et Cie. The California native has recently packed up her ambitious number of hats and scarves and is making a home for herself in Singapore.

4 THE PHOTOGRAPHER DAVID TSAI

Favorite shopping destination:

My husband and I have lived in Highland Park for about 20 years, and we have seen big changes in the area, especially in the last couple of years. I'm excited to see this neighborhood flourish and find its own voice and unique design identity.

For the design-obsessed:

There are probably more interesting and adventurous flea market excursions in rural parts of the country, but the Rose Bowl Flea Market is just so much fun—especially very early before the sun comes up. It's amazing to watch all the industry people and store buyers shopping intensely with walkie talkies and buying up all the crazy good stuff before the general crowd wakes up.

Best place to get lost:

Point Dume State Beach. I like to drive right up to the sand at the end of the driveway to watch the long summer sunsets. Most people go there for rock climbing, so the beach itself is always pretty empty.

Go-to spot:

I love that the Norton Simon Museum is always kind of operating under the radar. It has some of the most amazing art collections, and it's so quiet in there. I like to stand in front of the old masters and be in total awe at how they literally painted light. I eyeball each highlight and shadow through the brushstrokes sometimes so closely the docent will ask me to back off.

Dream collaboration:

Kelly Wearstler's work is constantly evolving and growing. Her spaces are so textured and layered and almost chaotic that I think it'd be a fun challenge to "explain" them through a two-dimensional, photographic space.

Up next:

I just wrapped a long shoot for designer and blogger Emily Henderson's upcoming coffee table book about styling. It's coming out this fall, and it's going to be beautiful. We got to shoot at some really gorgeous homes.

David Tsay is a Los Angeles-based photographer whose portfolio includes shoots for the nation's top magazines and lifestyle brands. He credits his mentor Clive Piercy for his love of apartment building sign typography.

Images: From top: David Tsay worked with Air Conditioned's Clive Piercy to develop the highly graphic look of his printed photography portfolio, which is titled "David Tsay in Black and White." The Tiempo sectional, Capella dining table and Quadrati side chairs are all integral parts of Janus et Cie's compulsively-shoppable outdoor living collection.
