At first sight: The Radiant lamps are elegant and timeless, perfectly reflecting Janice Feldman's personal vision. I love how the carved surfaces contrast with the simplicity of the orbs, resulting in this beautifully crafted texture juxtaposed with minimal design. On the job: My work has always been grounded in modernism and minimalist art; I am interested in the perception of nature and natural phenomena in relation to more structured forms. In the daylight... These lamps look like elegant stone sculptures, solid and weighty.

At night, they are transformed into lanterns, with an airiness that belies the materiality of the stone—I'm reminded of the paper lanterns you see in the Japanese tōrō nagashi ceremony.

At home: The subtle genius of these lamps is their versatility. They could stand on a table beautifully but could also effectively illuminate the small corners of a garden.

THE INSPIRATION: Taking their cue from the texture of yarn, the Radiant lamps are actually constructed of natural, undyed sandstone and beam from within, capable of casting an enchanting glow without being defined by the space in which they reside. Their versatility encourages a well-lived—and stylish—life among the indoors and outdoors alike, a Janus et Cie trademark.

Right: Throughout the home are thoughtful moments that provide stunning views of the surroundings. This small perch sits atop a spiral staircase that rises above the gardens designed by landscape architect Jerry Williams. Louvers shade some of the windows, offering privacy while still allowing light to flow inside.

Opposite: Below the husband's office, which hovers above the hillside, is another sitting area for the couple to relax with their guests. Woven Janus et Cie seating features cushions in a Perennials fabric. Builder Jim Davis brought with him a sense of craftsmanship to enhance the project.

On the pool deck sits a Sutherland sofa covered in Perennials outdoor fabric. The powder-coated resin wicker chairs are from Janus et Cie; the hand-carved cocktail tables are from Mix Furniture.
