Transition Seamlessly

Nearing its sixth decade as a leading glass door and window designer and manufacturer, Western Window Systems produced its first glass product in Phoenix in 1959.

Since then—and hundreds of noteworthy residential projects later—the company has become a recognized innovator in high-quality sliding and folding glass doors and windows. The inspiration behind the firm's sleek and functional products is the lifestyle shift toward merging the indoors and the outdoors. "Our sliding and folding glass doors are more than just entryways," says Scott Gates, president and CEO of Western Window Systems, "they are architectural elements that change the space around you." Outdoor living areas—thanks to options like Western Window Systems' folding and sliding doors, among others—have evolved from traditional patios to bold, reimagined spaces that attach to the home and blend the indoors with the outside. "By expanding living areas, maximizing views and letting in natural light and fresh air, our doors help create a new kind of gathering space that lets you entertain, relax and live better than ever."

"Western Window Systems is passionate about indoor-outdoor living."

Builder Bob Skibinski clad the house in natural shingles that were stained to resemble decades of weathering, while landscape architect Josh Rezac complemented the Cape Cod-inspired architecture with a manicured landscape.

Stone pavers echo the gray tones of the shingles and provide a chic foundation for a Janus et Cie umbrella and an RH dining table and chairs. Rezac's landscape design includes a California sycamore near the dining area, along with sedums and salvia.

Chaise lounges by RH and garden stools by Crate & Barrel rest on their own stone pads near the pool. Beyond is a stone banquette, with cushions covered in Perennials fabric, and a fire pit. A generous hedge shelters the expansive garden from neighbors.
